The political situation in the Straits Settlements at the present time is interesting and peculiar if not satisfactory. The majority of the Singapore freeholders members of Council and the Justices of the Peace have resigned over the Military Contribution question, but Penang resolutely refuses to join in the movement, and in fact, if the Penang Gazette may be taken as a correct exponent of public feeling in the Settlement, seems at it. Mr. Stenhouse's speech at the recent great meeting at Singapore on Penang contemporary character as nothing but froth and gas. "Why," it asks, "should not the Home Government measure its exactions by the length of the Colony's purse? It is right that every part of the Empire should pay according to its abilities for the protection of the whole. It is right that the rich should pay for the poor. The Colony of the Straits Settlements and her dependencies can well afford the demands of the Home Government if only the exaction is properly and fairly distributed over the area under British Protection." The latter allusion is to the question of whether the Native State should be invited to join in the contribution, a side issue with which we need not at present concern ourselves. The position taken up at Penang is that resignation over the Military Contribution question, while there are other more important matters to be urged, such as the granting of an unofficial majority in Council, is an unpractical priest. "There must," says the Gazette, "be a Military Contribution." No amount of protesting can get over that. "The question of amount necessarily follows, and that is one for argument." And Penang having grievances of its own, which the Singapore freeholders instead of trying to remove are accused of assisting to fasten on the Settlement, now refuses to support these gentlemen when they choose to try to raise amidst a fizzle of cheap "loud glory." So while the Singapore freeholders resign and are apparently supported in doing so by the Singapore community, at Penang an agitation is being carried on for a full measure of popular representation and a specific demand is put forward that the right of nominating a member of Council now possessed by the Chamber of Commerce should be transferred to an electoral body with a broader basis. The Singapore Chamber of Commerce has just been asked to nominate a member in place of the one who has resigned. It is expected that the Chamber will decline to do so, thus signifying its approval of the policy of resignation. At the same time Penang makes representations to the effect that a Chamber of Commerce is not a fit and proper body to exercise the right of nomination. Thus the two Settlements are pulling in opposite directions, and the effect of the resignation of the Singapore members must be eliminated by the non-support or active opposition of Penang. It is unfortunate that unanimity was not secured before resignation was decided on, but the partial resignation which has taken place will probably not be wholly without effect.
